

Family Support Services for Addiction Act Reps. Dan Meuser (R-PA) and David Trone (D-MD)

Problem - Families struggling with substance use disorder (SUD) lack basic support services. Helping loved ones who are struggling with SUD can be stressful, confusing, frustrating, and heartbreaking. While our communities are working hard to provide treatment options and support services, families still struggle with where to start. Parents trying to identify and access appropriate services for their child may find child-serving systems (e.g., mental health, education, juvenile justice, child welfare, substance use treatment) complicated and overwhelming. In addition, the pervasive stigma of addiction is often a huge barrier to families, leaving them feeling like they themselves have nowhere to turn for support, resources, and information.

Solution – Pass the Family Support Services for Addiction Act that would establish a grant program for nonprofit family community organizations that provide support for families of individuals struggling with SUD.

When family members are empowered and equipped with knowledge and guidance to support their loved ones struggling with SUD, those individuals are more likely to pursue and receive evidence-based treatment and families achieve better outcomes.

What Does the Family Support Services for Addiction Act (FSSAA) do?

The Family Support Services for Addiction Act (FSSAA) is a family and community-based approach to addiction treatment that works to address the deep-seated effects of the addiction crisis on families. The FSSAA would establish a grant program for nonprofit family community organizations that provide support for families of individuals struggling with substance use disorder.

What are family support services?

Family support services, also commonly called family peer support or parent peer support, offer hope, guidance, advocacy, and camaraderie for families of those receiving services from mental health, substance use, and related service systems. These services can include information and referral, support groups, system navigation to assist a family in finding or accessing resources, parent training and education, specialized crisis support, and much more.
